This paper examines the backgrounds and motivations of persons trained or training as Ayurvedic practitioners at two London-based institutions offering Ayurveda programmes at undergraduate and postgraduate levels. It draws upon in-depth interviews with individuals at various stages of their training and practice in order to examine the paths that bring them to Ayurveda, their motivations for undergoing training, and the role of spirituality and self-discovery in their journey. The study highlights the diversity of backgrounds and personal journeys that lead individuals to seek training in Ayurveda, and the impact of spirituality and self-discovery on their practice and understanding of Ayurvedic medicine.
training, and the ways in which they apply their knowledge of Ayurveda during and after their training period. The findings here corroborate what other scholars have demonstrated in the case of Asian traditions like Yoga and Ayurveda: these traditions have inevitably undergone shifts in meaning by virtue of their assimilation into the Western, in this case British, holistic health milieu. Most significant in Ayurveda's case is the shift away from a preoccupation with remedial medicine (the bedrock of modern South Asia), to a focus on self-knowledge and self-empowerment as a path to 'holistic healing' (understood as spiritual, not just physical, well-being). Even though the Ayurvedic curriculum transmitted at the educational institutions is based largely on that taught at Ayurveda colleges in India, the completely different orientations and dispositions of students in Britain (as compared to their South Asian counterparts) ensures that the Ayurveda they go on to apply and practise is radically different—this is 'spiritualised' Ayurveda, in radical contrast to the 'biomedicalised' version obtaining in modern mainstream...
