Framing Social Protest: The Exodus Narrative in Martin Luther King's Montgomery Bus Boycott Rhetoric.

Author(s): Selby, Gary S.

Abstract:
This essay explores Martin Luther King’s use of the Exodus narrative in his Montgomery bus boycott speeches, superimposing a religious drama on the campaign, King explained protesters present circumstances, urged they united action, and provided an overwhelming conviction that they would succeed. King’s speeches thus played boycott’s development, for they connected events in the protesters’ experience with a salient cultural tradition in those events meaningful. This suggests that narrative can play a potent role in the development of social movement essential point of convergence around which they gain coherence and power.
