No one could ever accuse tort law of being under-theorized. Corrective justice theorists, lawyer-economists, critical legal theorists and feminists have all contributed to the literature, even though it is only the first two groups that have really attempted to explain, justify or set goals for this subject as a whole. ¹ What neither the justice theorists nor the lawyer-economists seem seriously to question, however, is whether tort law is a suitable candidate for such theorization in the first place. The very fact that doctrinal tort lawyers cannot even agree as to such fundamental things as the subject's scope, its proper title (tort or torts?) and its relation to other branches of private law, provides a significant basis for doubt in this respect. And the fact that neither the justice theorists nor...
