The passive-aggressive component of the Mexican modal personality can be traced to the dominant and harshly punitive role of the father and to the general authoritarian nature of the Mexican culture. This passive-aggressiveness is perpetuated in the macho pattern of the Mexican male, and in the "martyr" pattern of the Mexican female. Any acting out of the resultant hostility to authority must be carried out in spheres safely distant from that authority's immediate control. The bullfight is seen to depict, symbolically, the power of the father, the subtle demands of the mother, and the fear of the child. Unlike the family situation, the awesome authority does not prevail, but rather is dominated and destroyed through the courage and daring of the matador. He, however, acting for the spectator, must accomplish this hostile act in a framework of "respect" for authority, and with a studied passiveness in and control of movement. By contrast, the "intellectualization" component of the Anglo modal personality can be traced to the dominant and controlling role of the mother and to the rational, scientific nature of the Anglo culture.
traced to the superficial ethic of "equality" among family members and to the general intellectualized nature of high culture. The attempt to mute authority by a pseudo-philosophy of togetherness, when authority is in fact assumed by the father, mother, and by the society, engenders a vagueness in role definitions, confusion in behavioral expectations, and an intellectualization of the resultant conflict.
