
Book description: * A fascinating and important text  Professor Littlewood marshals arguments that help us understand more clearly how we interactively use religion and science/healing to come to terms with the world around us. He draws in part on his clinical work as a psychiatrist with patients from religious movements in the West, but primarily on his earlier anthropological fieldwork and more recently with ethical transformations in the old and new African-Caribbean religions and in therapeutic and spiritual practices. There exists a close relationship between the explanations of misfortune, reconciliation, and restitution in the historical - and other - religions and in therapeutic and spiritual practices. In this book, Professor Littlewood examines the religious aspect in systems of therapeutics as well as the appearance of healing practices within social institutions.
