Abstract: Twenty-one chapters are presented detailing the development of Scottish art over the period 1460-1990. The chapters are divided into four parts. Part one, the later Middle Ages and the Reformation examines: the emergence of a modern nation, James III, IV and V, from c.1460; the Reformation, from c.1560; a country without a court, from c.1600; and an age of transition, from c.1600. Part two focuses on the Enlightenment: a new art, portraiture comes of age, from c.1700; the good old bards, artists, the Primitive Ideal, from c.1760; the birth of Scottish landscape, from c.1760; portraits of the Enlightenment, Raeburn and his contemporaries, from 1780; the poetry of common life, David Wilkie, from c.1800; and, genre, history and religion, Wilkie's contemporaries and his later work, from c.1820. Part three examines the Victorian era: artists of the nineteenth century, from c.1830; the romantic landscape, from c.1800; the landscape, from c.1860; east and west, the rural scene, from c.1870; and the claims of art, a crisis of conscience, from c.1885. Part four examines the modern age: the opening of the modern era; the colourists, from c.1895; modern romanticism, Cowie and the Edinburgh Group, from c.1918; the Scots Renascence, artists of the wars, from c.1930; the second world war and the post-war period, from c.1939; and the present day, from c.1960. The main theme of the book highlights how the different movements reflect the social climate of the time, as well as society's attitude towards art.
