Abstract
Although the concept of forgiveness is accepted by many as personal and relational healing, some have abandoned its historical connection with religious faith. This uncoupling of religion and forgiveness overlooks a progression of healing that both includes and transcends personal healing for forgiveness of its therapeutic power. A brief discussion of the concept of forgiveness is followed by a proposed model of forgiveness that exemplifies the... progression of healing proffered by religious faith. Current trends in the forgiveness literature are considered along with their therapeutic implications.
